

The NYeC Blog

We are delighted to share with you our brand new NYeC Blog, one of our many new communications tools, which now lives on our brand new NYeC website, <http://nyehealth.org> launched last week.

The NYeC Blog will be a voice from the inside. Written primarily by David Whitlinger, our Executive Director, along with occasional guest bloggers, the NYeC Blog will be a place to share a little about our strategies, plans, and successes. It will be an informal yet thought-provoking platform to discuss, share, and meditate on the state of health IT in New York and across the country, the good work already completed, and the work we still have ahead.

We look forward to the ideas and discussions that will be sparked by this blog, whether around the conference table or the water cooler.

Metro-North Express, James Fenimore Cooper Car

Date: August 7th, 2012

Time: 6:16pm

Location: Metro-North Express, James Fenimore Cooper Car

Well, here we are. A quiet place. The Metro-North train traveling underground as it leaves Grand Central on its way through Harlem and up the Hudson Valley to the river towns that house the millions of commuters who work in New York City. This particular train has cars named for authors: The James Fenimore Cooper car is in between John Cheever and Thomas Wolfe, a small reminder of the time when authors wrote on paper, as opposed to on a Mac-Book with high-speed 4G internet connectivity, and enough storage to house the all of the published novels generated during their respective lifetimes.

In a way, this is analogous to the incredible transformation that we are engaged in with health information technology—moving from countless tons of paper files, containing life-saving data, which is trapped in file rooms across the state, toward a secure, internet-enabled health information network that responsibly allows information to be shared across the care continuum to improve care.
